Outstanding performances as test engineers work brings Center’s TDAward money to the United Way of the Indian County, National Service Agencies and Interfaith Community Council.

The award, written by L. V. Bryan, head of the Aeronautics Department, noted that one of the Center’s key personnel qualified to do such teaching at this time.

New balloon presents fine compromise for test

Only needs half the gas

That round white and blue tethered helium balloon seen recently over the Center’s range area provides a good compromise between the tethered helium balloon and a hot air balloon, says Duane Power, the Center’s chief test pilot.

Ordinarily, a helium balloon requires about half the amount of helium of the larger helium balloons. It goes up high, he says, because it was actually designed for free-flight.

The tethered hot air balloon used for tests must, in comparison, be larger due to the fact that when the wind velocities are under 12 knots and there is only 0.4 inch of lift, the balloon will be hit by the wind before breaking, as it was actually designed for free-flight.

The new balloon presents free-flight qualities that are expected to provide almost the same capability as the larger helium balloon at considerably less cost and with added safety for crew.

The dual free-flight requires about half the amount of helium of the larger helium balloons. It goes up high, he says, because it was actually designed for free-flight.

Although it won’t stand nearly as much wind as the larger balloons, it is designed to fly to 30 to 46 meters, while the new balloon is useful only in 12 to 18 knot wind.

Power uses the balloon for test purposes only, for the test pilot, to get the balloon into the wind.

The National Weather Service reports winds today at 40 to 50 miles per hour.

Power prefers the large helium balloon for test purposes only, for the test pilot. Power likes the new balloon for its test pilot, to get the balloon into the wind.

All measurements are made at Atascadero Airfield.
